About the song, FIL BO RIVA says:

"Everything's Illusion" is probably the song I had lying around the longest.

It was actually supposed to be a slow ballad and appear on my first album, but I never managed to finish it. Then in 2021, during the cold Berlin winter, I picked it up again and finally finished writing it.

This song reflects the feeling of infinite possibilities we have in this world: always wanting more, always wanting everything, always being able to get what we want right now. "See the moon rising, see the sun smiling, but I just want more" clearly shows this feeling of never being satisfied with the world, our lives and the things we already have. In a way it is a hymn to today's society and describes my personal view on an overstimulated and unreflective modern capitalistic world. Because ultimately it all boils down to one illusion: who are we as humans to know what we really need?
